Dear Chairman Genachowski:

The impact that mobile and wireless technology has had on our lives cannot be denied. The way we do business and interact with each other is based in how we utilize technological tools. However, currently, the wireless marketplace strongly needs a disruptor that can deliver these tools more affordably to Americans. Indeed, after reading of LightSquared's plans to operate a wholesale-only nationwide mobile broadband network, I am optimistic that the FCC has before it a proposal that can positively disrupt the industry and ultimately increase the consumer "utility" of our nation's scarce spectrum resources.

Not only will consumers benefit from LightSquared's service, but there will be a noticeable impact on our economy in the form of new job creation and opportunities for innovation. In the reply comments of these proceedings, Aircado has stated that LightSquared's goal of providing a wholesale network will be a strong foundation for them to build their business and work towards meeting the country's growing broadband needs. We cannot stifle attempts to bring these services to a larger market while encouraging job creation in the process.

Growing businesses like Aircado need an opportunity to expand their reach and develop their market. I certainly hope you can appreciate the opportunity to push forward in this field. LightSquared has made it clear that this new network will be a great benefit to both businesses and consumers.

Sincerely yours,

Laurie Peters
